This is a bit late, but I was scrolling back reading posts that I had missed and came across the "Plato is a Doofus" comments. I couldn't resist this one:

Touched by love or not,
Doofus Plato was a hoot!
Poets are for owls.

I was thinking of logging in as "Plato is a Doofus" to make this post, but I was afraid I might be woletted. Colleen, if you're still here, nothing in my remark way down the scroll line was about you, and I ask your forgiveness if I caused you confusion or hurt.

I can't decide if Plato had momentarily overcome his aversion to poets or was being really really really cynical, as in, yeah, get touched by love and the next thing you know you're rhyming "moon" and "June" and you know where that gets you. Let's interpret your way; it's nicer.

I did reply way way way down in the thread, but I thought if I also posted this up top you'd have a better chance of seeing my apology and clarification that I wasn't dinging you at all.

It's not Carlos echoing, it's the man in Boston (Chris?). I have muted one of the pics, and I believe the issue is with Chris's computer. Are you sure Carlos isn't watching the panel? He asked if people out here could hear, so I thought he might be watching the chat.

Yes, we are sure. Carlos has his own chat room. We just get his video here. It confuses everyone at first.

No need to mute any video on this screen. Carlos is only broadcasting his voice through the OB2 camera, not both of them. Chris' echo is from his end. Nothing we can do about it here.

It's a porch/simulated limb for the owlets to use in the coming days, once they start venturing out. It was also a preventative measure for those worrying about falling owlets. See better images here: <http://mollysbox.wordpress.com/blog/>

 It's a cute name we came up with last night to alert other contributors here when a poster may be up to no good, or has a general negative vibe. I.e. is being rude to other chat members and appears to only want to cause trouble.

The origin for my suggestion of labeling them a Smurf is linked to this little bit of internet history/jargon. http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Smurf\_attack

A few others mentioned 'pellet' would be a suitable moniker also, for obvious reasons. Both are clues to consider using the 'Flag' feature under the offending parties' posts. Normal cautions apply. Think of it as a judicial responsibility, not revenge or as a means to disagree with someone.

 Sunday morning, we heard a bunch of crows making quite a ruckus, and went to investigate. We found this Great Horned Owl trying to have a peaceful nap. He spent the entire day in the pine tree, and the crows never let up. Quite a treat to have this visitor. We live in a city, and never expected to see a Great Horned Owl here!

We have screech owls around here, had heard them but had never seen thm; in January @ dusk one had flown into our dining room window, was lying stunned on the ground, went in to call wildlife rehab, kept checking on him while trying to call, after about 40 min after the incident looked and did not see him/her, looked up in the tree and there he was! Was very glad he survived the incident. 😊 Sorry though, bird, for the camera flash.

Now when I look at his picture I have by my chair, holding that big fish...I smile and remember him saying that. See, I said it would be corny!! He wasn't even from the South Kristi!!

Second part: as a wildlife rehabilitator (AK?) commented earlier, it is best to leave young birds found on the ground—their parents will find them. They are in the so-called “branching” stage, just before they can really fly, and will usually be okay. However, people do often “rescue” them and have very interesting experiences. One of the best books I’ve read about that sort of thing is called, “Corvus: A Life With Birds” by Esther Woolfson.

After a tornado came through here years ago, and tore down so many trees, it changed the landscape, I found several little birds on the ground. They were scattered, and their wing feathers were still banded. I did not hear momma screaming at me, so I picked them up and took them home to help. One died, and I was able to release one of the others, but I am sure she did not make it, but the third one thrived and even after she “flew the coop” she came back and let me feed her for about two weeks, and then, as she should have, she flew off. She was a downy woodpecker and her name was Chi Chi. I really missed her after she flew away, but I was glad to have her be so healthy.

Ginger--nice story. I really love the downies (we have lots in our yard), and they are quite tame compared to the other birds. When their fledglings came to the yard last year, one of them actually landed on me and looked at me as if to say, “is this right?”

Bird story: I know crows are the enemy here (smile), but my sister once found a baby crow and, not realizing its mother was probably nearby, took it home to raise it. JB was very smart and quite playful. If you left any jewelry lying around (we’d take off watches, etc. to swim), JB would swoop down and grab it to put in his stash under a roof shingle. He also loved to ride on the top of the car when my sister drove down their long driveway, and he always flew off just before she entered the main road. Eventually, JB joined some other crows and left, but he often came back to the house to visit us and look for treats.

I'm not James (not Jim) Hill, however, when you are on the other website they say they are more interesting than us. It really is funny. I do like this site better. I love seeing how we have grown, (Not just from sitting here all day and night) but from expanding our interests and talents. Maybe that is not as stimulating as twitter but it's my kind of place.

Ingrid, the chat Carlos uses is linked to his USTREAM account, the one which he uses to manage the broadcasting of his video. It amazes me how so many (thousands) of people across the globe have come together to watch this nature story unfold. I just wish that we all could come together in mutual understanding, and appreciation for what we have, what we can share, and what we can learn from one another every day and throughout the world. This story just proves it really doesn't take much... just a few lovely people like the Royal family.

I used to complain about the owls sleeping/standing so close to the camera until the day they all were at the back of the box and we could see them standing/sitting/sleeping in the muck. For some reason I feel better thinking they are in the front of the box because it is clean. 😊

Actually the way the box is constructed there is plenty of fresh air. There is a ridge vent on the top and on the top of the sides so there is always a convection type movement of air. Very clever. That is probably why Molly was in the back with the eggs. It would have been a little less air movement to help keep heat in for the eggs.

If you are collecting bios of conservationists for the wiki, consider adding Bob Evans and his work to preserve wildlife habitat and to encourage others to preserve habitat. There were enough treats last night for every owlet to eat a whole rodent! We didn't see them eat because the outside view was on. But it sure sounds as if they are all eating! We know that even little Wesley can swallow a mouse whole. "Cause when he did that for the first time, it seemed to signal to Molly that he could take care of himself and she could spend more time out of the nest hunting.

The little guys are fast approaching the teenage years aka the "branching" stage. Most birds leave the nest before they are ready to fly -- they either fall out because of all the back and forth in the nest, or they try and fly -- and can spend up to 2 weeks on the ground. The parents feed them during this time. I've been a wildlife rehabilitator for 30+ years and the branching stage is the time we get calls about birds on the ground, from raptors to songbirds, unable to fly. If the area is relatively safe we advise to leave them alone for the parents to finish the job. Just wanted to give a heads up that this will most likely be the case with Molly's brood.

Good morning from Atlanta.

I need some help from the chat room, please. I started the Owl Resources and Just for Fun pages on the wiki and will put up the Just for Kids page sometime today. But I'm having trouble finding material for children beyond easy-to-read fact sheets and owl pellets. If you know of any good educational K-12 resources, online or off, could you please either post them here or else mail them to me at meillom (at) yahoo.com? As soon as I put up the page, please feel free to add info directly: <http://mollyowl.pbworks.com/>

Note: This is a nonsectarian chat room. Any material that is religion based, political, offensively graphic, and so on and so on and so on, will not be accepted and will be removed if you post it directly to the wiki.

Thank you everyone for the thanks on my four-part Haiku, and sorry for the late reply. That last one locked up my computer for an hour!!!

I need to go catch up, if I can. For some reason my McAfee goes into hypermode when I post and takes up all the CPU.

POETS & JL -- & Chris from Olympia, WA: Currently, there's a single page on the wiki for poetry and it's very long already. So far, it's one night's worth of poems, which JL copied over (from Friday night), and a few (very few) that some have copied over themselves.

Should we break it into pages, by week or night? Or person?! Or -- what? What's the best way to encourage people to copy their own poems over?

JL (and anyone else!): if you could help with saving Chat Stream Transcripts and / or with the Timeline, that would be GREAT. And if you actually managed to grab a copy of Friday night's chat stream, that is awesome! I emailed you earlier this evening but pro'ly you didn't see it yet. For some reason. 😊

A haiku is a non rhyming poem with 3 lines of 17 syllables: 5 syllables in the first line, 7 in the second, 5 in the third. Those are the only technical rules. Traditionally, a haiku is about something in nature, and the three lines together express a complete thought. You can use any punctuation appropriate throughout, and any kind of word, so long as it fits the syllabication. Try it; you'll like it!

Yes we will! BTW, I just read your question below, Annemarie. I do not speak with Carlos. I just have too much time on my hands and have been able to listen to almost all of his "broadcasts". I also follow his chat room, where a lot of useful info is passed between him and his cohorts.
