There really is more room in that house. These darlings have really been growing!!! Seems like yesterday we were just watching them hatch. What a wonderful experience this is!

Watching them try to stretch and climb over each other is just hilarious. I keep giggling and DJ just can't get what I think is so funny. Reminds me of my kids attempting to backseat the car on road trips. Each one vying for their own space and trying to push the other out of the way.

Why did Molly and McCoo fly by several times last night between 8-9 with no food? Was afraid they were followed by other birds.

I love how they seem to pre-nach each other and seem to be very gentle. Unlike the eagle babes.

Here is a site that takes beautiful photos of McCoo going to the bathroom. This site has been shared by someone kind enough to post it a few weeks ago. I love the site.

My sister is coming to the mountains from Savannah on Sunday. I can't wait to have her visit my new home and spend a few days with me. I sure am glad she is on her way. That way she can spend time together and watch babies. I will not feed a kid asking for her. See ya Saturday. lol.

I have to remember that when I see young robins in the yard. If you watch for a bit, someone comes to feed them and they fly around and manage to get into a bush or something. When something scary like a kid gets too close they show that they really can fly. Crows me up.

Before I read the post about Molly landing on the camera platform I thought it might have been moved so Carlos could get a better view if an owl decided to hop to the landing platform. What is really funny, we have a china blue cat, Bottley, he is over 25 lbs, not just a big fricking cat. And he runs when the pressure drops, he did it earlier, right now he has had another, that he developed this talent when we had a downed tree and was standing watching it fall, happen outside my kitchen window and we lost a huge oak tree and many other trees in the neighborhood, could be from a small tornado, but I watched the rain go side ways one way and then the opposite completely horizontal changing direction a few times, white out then the tree was uprooted... unbelievable... that really was the shock, the cross hog back out to eat the forest.

I still think it's a function of the activity of the critters. Speaking on the basis of literally thousands of trap nights I've put it (1 trap night=1 trap out for one night). It's amazing - some nights they do absolutely dead quiet, and other nights they count way to get going.

I understand that work, but my computer at home is slower. It sounds like it's always processing something. There must be something running, but I can't figure it out. Would being plugged into a wireless hub slow it down? It doesn't seem like it should. The wireless connection is secure so there shouldn't be anyone else trying to run on it with me.

I would think if the flash bothered them, they would veer away or something if flying, and look around if perched. I just don't think they care. I have motion sensitive white/cam outside my window and I have never seen any of the animab pounce or look around when the flash goes off - deer, coons, foxes, I am often watching the animals live when the flash goes off). We did once get some policemen in the picture and, trust me, they DID notice it.

We are expecting them to come out of the nest around 50 days and this is clearly too early, but Moly has not been doing things on the schedule we expected. Remember she left the nest box much earlier than anticipated. Maybe she doesn't know they don't have all of their flight feathers yet? I know everyone hasn't agreed but to me it's looked like she was trying to get them to step out the last couple nights by holding treats just out of their reach.

OWO, I read somewhere recently it could be as old as 62 or 63 days before they fledge. I am amazed at how the days can vary, with these wee creatures. Five days difference is a lot, with watching the rate they have been changing at, they were so different but we see, still walking on their wee knees.
