Having much too much fun, but must bid y'owl adieu. If I don't finish my work project, there will be no funds to fund the electricity that supplies the computer that provides the fun that . . . you get the idea! 😊

A box made of wood
In a neighboring town,
A camera was added
And look what was found.

Two regal owls
Had made this their home
We all came together
And loved what was shown.

For months we have watched
as time ticked away.
Soon they must leave us,
Though we wish they could stay.

The things we have learned
have taught us so much.
They brought us together
And our hearts they did touch.

Much thanks to the Royals
as we know this must end.
Let them know how we loved it,
much gratitude we send.

Thank you Carlos and Donna
For such a great experience
you have shared with so many.

Owlosaurus: I posted this question a couple of days ago and no one responded (I don't think you were on at the time). Might you know if the owls keep this "fluff" as an undercoat or do they actually shed all of it as the real feather emerge? Just curious
- Also, those of you stressing about the box being empty
- I've already forced myself to begin detox so the pain and suffering isn't so great when the time actually comes. 😊

Hello MODs. I've been mostly lurking with an occasional post. I feel compelled to really introduce myself now. I'm in Raleigh, NC, older than Merritt, and totally addicted to Moly and the gang. But way before the owlets were a glint in Moly's eye, I made plans for a vacation in Mexico. Now, I have to leave on Saturday for a whole week! I'm seriously bumming that my online time will be very limited and what am I going to do? Miss the fledging? Now, the excitement? I can't stand it!!!! Help! I need serious emotional consOWlation!

Getting ready to. The typical age range for stepping out of the nest is between 50 to 60 days old. Max is 53 today. They won't leave for good until mid-June, however. It takes a long time for a barn owl to learn how to fly.

I have noticed the owlets not getting as much food from Molly and McGee, and I know that one theory is that maybe they are trying to make them hungry so they will step out of the box. I wonder other "forces" are at work, also. I know many animals eat a LOT when they are 'babes', and their food intake decreases as they mature, because they don't need so much energy for growing. Does anyone know for sure about this, or are we all just observing and guessing right now?
Today, 06:27:55 - Flag - Like - Reply

I like your theory that their food needs are decreasing. Molly and McGee don't need to entice them out of the box. They will leave that box when they are good and ready, with or without any enticement. IMO.

Bonnie, I'm wondering if the crows are still a real threat to the owlets...seems to me that the owlets are too big now for a crow to take them, but I'm sure no expert. Owlosaurus, what would you think on that?

It's certainly possible...but awfully hard to tell. The only ones we can really identify as the same individuals are the downy and hairy woodpeckers that come, because if you look closely with binocs, you can see slight differences in their markings. Hard to do with cardinals...but so glad you have the babies!

You know, I'm sitting here watching the house wrens build their nest in the little house we have for them, thinking about just how amazing birds are. I'm sure it's the same pair that's come back the last three years--the male uses the same perch to sing, they use the same house, and they arrive at almost exactly the same time each spring. They are so used to us that I can sit within a few feet of them to watch their nest building. How do they do that! (Meaning, how can they navigate their way back to exactly the same spot from year to year.) What incredible creatures birds are!

After a fun day of play hopping in the owl box, scratching at the floor, and stretching out those beautiful wings, the owlets all showed signs of getting ready to fledge, especially Max and Pat. Owlossurus later theorized they would begin to fledge closer to dawn after letting the food in their bellies settle from all the eating they do when the night begins. No one stepped out at any time last night, but Max did step up on the lip of the threshold of the door! Not just standing behind it, or lifting one leg up, but actually standing on the upraised threshold! Pattison, too, got as close to the edge as he could, and both and Max stuck their heads out the door very often.

Good morning, oh great Owlet! I coked out! Then I woke up in the wee hours of the a.m., saw Max STANDING on the upraised threshold, and my adrenaline surged all over again. So, I am up!

When Max biddly walked up to the ledge last night, stepped up onto it, then raised one foot to beak of a little schmutz, then.... put it right back down on the ledge again. I thought I would scream! LOL She kept doing that to me until I was worn out and had to crash. It was soooooo close to a step out.

Hi Christy--My observation is that the guys like to play with the food count during the night hours, but once it's daylight and Molly and McGee have stopped bringing deliveries, they adjust it to reflect actual rodent count. So any post you see just after dawn would be accurate for any given day.

Open 2 screens, minimize and put the side by side. I haven't seen an add in 6 weeks by doing that! And I can watch the owls and read the chat at the same time, on two fairly nice sized screens. You can drag the sides to make them as big or as small as you want once you minimize.

Well, folks. Doesn't look like a fledge night to me, and the need for sleep is really catching up with me. I want to go back to bed!! Does anyone here plan to be up when dawn breaks in San Marcos? If not, I'll set my alarm (for real this time) to get up in time to post the nightly summary, but if someone here would be available to do that would be great. Just make sure you have the word "summary" in it, because that is what Latrippi searches for.

Just wanted to throw something out there....

When checking on other people's histories (people that we may not have noticed in here before, etc.), just keep in mind that some people may also be commenting on things going on in other chats...and all of those get intermixed into this chat's history. So some statements/comment may seem "out of place" or not making sense to the discussion going on here.

Just keep that in mind when checking for validity of a person's history... 😊

Also, there are different "flavors" of smurfs. Some are just the kids just out of school looking for a chat room to invade, others are the clueless types who don't know how to use a chat room and repeatedly ask the same question (sometimes in ALL CAPS), and others yet are doing it on purpose to annoy...
Flavor 2 can usually be trained with a little patience.

Hi Merritt,
We missed you.
So, the hubby wanted to know what the hockey sticks I was doing up at 4 a.m. last night/this morning. (He was getting up for work) I showed him the chat room and said, "see, see, people with insomnia and EMOD all over the country are still awake and watching baby owls eating rats! (He gave up on me months ago when this started) But I watch owls and chat with owl of you while I work on stories all night. So he tucked me in to bed at 4 and I guess I slept until 110 or something. Truly a night owl

Hey there, that is way too funny! Sometimes I think we all have similar lives on this chat, it has become a world unto itself, kind of like the owls are a catalyst for connection, and haku! My niece says when she comes home and hears the owlets screaming, she knows I am still up! But they and all of you here keep me company late at night like nothing else can. I even like this better than talking to my boring sister! 😊
