I missed the bluebirds fledging this morning - but I did see 2 of mine (in my backyard) fly out - they left the exact same day! Ask your sister if she has any house wrens in the area. ... they will toss the eggs (and even the babies) out of the nest - I had 5 chickadee eggs in one of my boxes and the next day they were gone - it was a house wren. Found some of the broken eggs on the ground \dots

Owlosaurus That's an interesting observation. When they were younger, all huddled in the back. Maybe he's just gotten to the stage where he's more comfortable venturing out from the safety of the back of the nest box. Today, 18:40:54 - Flag - Like - Reply

Checking in on the adorable owlets this evening. Fogot my iphone today so had to go 8 hours without seeing them and it was not fun.

Re: the question and discussions below abuot mites, fleas and lice on owls (and most all birds). I did read the article in your post, Owlosaurus, ww.jstor.org/pss/30134186 as well as this one http://animaldiversity.ummz.umich.edu/site/accounts/information/Tyto_alba.html before I posted. Guess I was thinking of a different discussion topic in the slow time while we're waiting for the fun to begin other than "where's Molly", "why do owls sleep standing up", "where is the 4th owl". Today, 18: 24:53 - Flag - Like - Reply Diana "V"

While I was looking for a picture of lice, I found Strathcona Raptor Center in Canada. They said studies have shown that owls see three times farther than humans, don't see color very well and can constrict one eye while they did te the other. They can also sleep with one half of their brain while the other side is awake. It can sleep with one eye open. They didn't specify if that was all owls or just great horned owls.

This again reminds me to feel sorry for Carlos and Donna! They can't go and do much in their back yard without all of us hearing them!!

                         I know that most birds preen their feathers and shake and scratch to rid themselves of their down . Perhaps not a pleasant or appropriate topic of conversation here (but a lot of other gory. "eeewy" things have been) - but, has anyone considered that the owls may have feather mites, fleas and/or lice of some type.
                         Thus, another reason for so much "picking", itching and scratching - especially when one sibling picks at another. It is quite common for many species of birds, especially raptors, to be afflicted with some sort of parasite especially when they are in close quarters such as a nest site.

                                 Someone on here a while back, works with wildlife birds and said they don't get fleas but could have mites. I think chances are slim, seeing that this box was new and hadn't been used before Molly. They all seem healthy. I think it's just the new feathers coming in that itch so bad. And maybe the scratching is just to get all the down out.

                                When they were all fluffy and downy you could definitely see bugs crawling around on the owlets, especially when they stood in the sun. Not enough definition to see exactly what they were though.

Ha, I thought Wesley was named after Stacey's book, but after reading the royals web site (www.caribsroyal.com), it says their son Carlos' middle name is Wesley - interesting - or maybe tha tfact is in Donna's bio on the 50th reunion site. Carlos is VERY technically savvy, not to mention a huge entrepreneur. Check out the reunion page and read both Donna's and Carlos' bios. He sure made out in real estate at the right time - got out well before the crash, although I guess his book (one of them) on selling real estate in on Amazon - or was. Came out about 10 years ago.

         Right before the eggs started to hatch there were a couple fat little mouse bodies in the nest. It was like they were keeping them stashed so there

How do I find those pictures to look at from last night?

When you first open a FB account....you WILL get a friend request from one of the co-creators of FB (I believe) automatically....he's "friends" with everyone.

Also - you may want to review your security settings...just to make sure you're not sharing your info with "everyone" out there. If you need help with this, I

Yep, lots of articles about FB privacy (or lack thereof) lately. Just make sure your privacy settings are secure as Melanie said and be careful what you you don't spend some time on it. I have most of my stuff "locked down"... and really only let "friends" see things. "Friends of friends" and "everyone" is a bit more leaving yourself open to "predation" and unwanted "friends". Again - if you have ANY questions... I'mpretty familiar and comfortable in using

My guess is that you're "open" account is allowing anyone (and that would be ANYONE that uses the web) to view your info. Be careful what you put in

I would "ignore" anyone you aren't sure of... I always do. If it's someone from high school/college that I haven't seen/heard from in years... and they found be through a suggestion...then I usually will ask them "how do I know you again?" If they have a valid answer that checks out...then I'll usually dick on "Account" on the upper right corner, then "privacy settings". Good advice from Melanie. Keep all private until you are comfortable with the site

Hi Karen--you're back! What part of the country are you in now, on your travels?

We just left Kansas and now have been in North Platte, Nebraska for 2 days. We start out for S. Dakota in the morning. We are going to take our time getting there. Thanks for asking! It really is great to be back!! We did 2 nights of Walmart camping on the way from our home in Oregon to Kansas. No internet service there or in Kansas Today, 17:28:33 - Flag - Like - Reply Natalie

       Yes, go to start, click all programs, click on accessories, click on snipping tool ... when it pops up, go ahead and put your cursor where you want it to start and hold you mouse key down till you get the whole pic...then in the small box, click on file and choose where you want to keep it.

      I particularly liked the story about the headmaster who sent them all to bed with just water and porridge, forbidding them to watch the owls anymore and Sarah wishing and hoping for a forever family but not knowing if it would ever happen. Wow, how cool, now suddenly she has one! I'm very happy for her. If I thought any part of the story was true I would be sympathetic, but I think she/he(?) is just someone trying to channel Dickens and having some fun. Fun is OK, but I would hate to see anyone drawn in by her story. There was a 'girl' on the Africa cam by the posted name of Giovanna who just about had people sending funds to cover her emergency life-saving surgery! She started out just like our little Sarah. I haven't flagged her and I won't tell anyone that they shouldn't respond to her, but I will once again say: Beware.

                    James, sorry to be so out of it...but, if you go on FaceBook to keep in touch with people (which I'd very much like to do with many of the people here), how do you email them if you don't know their last names? I guess I'd really better bite the bullet and try to set up an account there... 😀

                           If someone is logging into THIS site via Facebook, then you can just hover over their name and VISIT ME ON whatever they logged in with i.e., Facebook should show up. If you click on that, it will take you to their FB page. Underneath their name is a link that says "Send (insert name) a message". If you do not have a FB account, I'mthinking it will take you to something that sets it up at that point. From there you can send a message.
                           if someone on here isn't using FB to log in - then I guess you would have to ask them what name they use on FB to make sure it's the same person...

                           If they log into this site/chat through their FB account, then it's just a matter of following the link that pops up when you hover over their screen name here. Otherwise you need to know exactly how to find them on FB. Some people like to keep their IDs separate, which is fine, it keeps the craaaazzzy people at bay. 😯 😇 😆 😃

James - I was reading down below, and not sure if you caught my response.
It was in regards to the owls standing on one leg. You said: \it There \ was \ a \ very \ thorough \ explanation \ of the \ physiology \ behind \ this \ behavior posted here some time ago, and there is much more scientific info about it on the web.
I was just wondering as to where you found this information, b/c I too have searched for information on this on the web, but to no avail. Would love to know if you found something specific. Thanks.

I do have a Biology degree...yes.
       But I didn't study Barn Owls specifically. I simply do not have the time to constantly be searching for info (wish I did)...as I've been trying to secure work as of late, and most of my day is spent doing that. I try to come here when I can, and search for information...when I can. But thought, sometimes just reaching out to others on this site (who might have more time to do that very thing...lke yourself) would also prove to be helpful.

       Funny... I searched and combed through a ton of those links, and then some. Even typed in Barn Owl Anatomy and/or mechanics of standing on one leg (and the like) and not one link spoke to it. Guess I'll have to keep digging.
       And my google search went a bit deeper than "vanila"...that example I gave "barns owls standing on one leg" was just that...and example. I tried several other word combinations...and still didn't come up with anything that spoke to the mechanics of this behavior.
       On to trying other browsers...or possibly some biology/avian books.

        Carlos already said several times that there will be no human intervention and that he is letting nature take care of things. Meaning that if an owlet dies, he is going to let Molly and McGee manage it just like they would if there were no cameras watching them. These are wild owls who we are fortunate enough to be able to watch doing what wild owls do.

         Just to be "clear" though...she (and I think we all know which biologist we're speaking about) did say that in her experience she's never witnessed a barn owl laying down (at this age) in a WILD setting (i.e., a tree cavity or barn rafters). She's never wat ched/observed Barn Owls in a man-made box before.
         Could be that these owls act slightly differently due to the "environment" that they are in...they adapt. Being that the box is much smaller than a tree cavity or barn - it could be that this is simply how they behave in a smaller space. I repeat... COULD BE.
         I'm not trying to be "counter attacking", nor am I defending her. I just wanted to make that little, but important point clear. She clearly stated...in what she's witnessed in wild settings...not boxes.
         Just my thoughts - no ill will intended.

  I notice the debris on the nestbox floor is pretty dirty now. I imagine the California climate has helped delay this process. In wetter dimes (such as here in northwest UK) the boxes get dirtier and wetter as the breeding season goes on. In our centre we've had to remove owlets and bathe them as they have been so dirty - but only in a minority of nestboxes. A few weeks ago we sadly lost a White Faced Owlbaby due to the dirt. The other two owlets were removed and are doing well in our hospital, and I added a 'ladder' in the inside of the nest box for future use

                           Maybe someone to assist Carlos would be more appropriate. 😃 He must manually change all the connections and such every time these views change.
                           The one daytime camera is also a web cam and it's not protected from the direct sun, which can damage the camera sensor. It's probably left off through the part of the day where it would receive direct sunlight for that reason.

                    I've been doing some reading and watching videos, and it seems the barn owls often fledge in daylight hours. I don't know if it's early or late in the day, or all day. I can't tell. But several places talk about how barn owls, although very nocturnal, can be seen hunting during the day, too. So, I guess like us, they can be up at abnormal hours at times.
                    I also noticed the males do have some spots (look dosely at McGee's pictures Carlos took) but just less than the females.
                    Can you tell I'minterest ed in all this.

                           Some owls live in parts of the world that don't get dark for a few months every year! Actually, owls have a very convenient shift system hehe, some are indeed nocturnal, but some are diurnal and hunt in daylight, and others hunt at dawn and dusk (crepuscular). Barn Owls are nocturnal-crepuscular and can hunt any time of night or day if they need to - they hunt by using their hearing rather than sight. Barn Owls prefer not to hunt in broad daylight unless really necessary as they fly slow and low to the ground, easy prey for hawks like Red-tails.

                           Yes. They will return to the nest until they are around 80 days old. They they will fly away to find homes of their own, sometime mid-June at this rate.

                           One or more of the family will likely use this box as a roost for a longer period too, with the others finding their own roots nearby. Eventually they will all drift further afield to find their own territories by Autumn and Winter. It'll be interesting to see if Molly keeps this box as a roost . 😃

Jill, he's probably getting Wesley back for his earlier 'flight exercising'. What an active box this afternoon, is the 'FAA control tower' almost completed?

I have a feeling we may never know why they are behaving so nutty today...But I bet they know... 🙂 .. It is entertaining and keeps us on our toes....

Are we missing something. Could there be something in the box that is frightenign themor irritating them? Or is it just young curiousity. The younger owls

I personally saw the egg being kicked around by the owlets as though they were playing a game of soccer! They weren't trying to hurt it, however, because when they quit playing, one owlet sat down and carefully preened the egg. I swear to you he removed all the gunk that had accumulated on it, and then left it behind the post nice and clean. I have not seen it since then, but Chris in Olympia, WA has a picture of the egg from that day with the date on it. I will ask her to post it again for you now. As far as I know, the egg has not been destroyed. Today, 14:03:53 - Flag - Like - Reply Liked by 🎆 Barbara Dangbar

I always thought daylight was hurtful to owls, and that they sleep (roost) during the day. Only by watching first hand can we really know about owls.

Some owls live in parts of the world that don't get dark for a few months every year! Actually, owls have a very convenient shift system hehe, some are indeed nocturnal, but some are diurnal and hunt in daylight, and others hunt at dawn and dusk (crepuscular). Barn Owls are nocturnal-crepuscular and can hunt any time of night or day if they need to - they hunt by using their hearing rather than sight. Barn Owls prefer not to hunt in broad daylight unless really necessary as they fly slow and low to the ground, easy prey for hawks like Red-tails. Has there been any mention from Carlos or anyone on thoughts of male/female in this bunch? It's early to tell fromplumage I know, but booking at the facial disc coming through on themall I noticed something that made me ponder. Max has a very round disc. At our centre we have two imprinted Barn Owls - Sparky and Tythe, brother and little sister. Sparky has a more heart-shaped facial disc while Tythe's is more round. I don't know that this means that much but made me

                           They are in a fenced yard, in a gated community. The predator risk is most likely reduced to the neighbor's great danes, if one happens to go to that side of the fence. But the neighbor is aware of the owl box and most likely has taken that into consideration.

Live Owl Nest Box Cam What birds are protected by law? Most migratory birds found in the United States are protected by international treaties as well as U.S. laws. No part of protected birds, live or dead, including feathers, claws, bones, skins, or taxidermy-mounted birds can be possessed without an appropriate permit, which is exceptionally hard to obtain even for legally acquired birds or bird parts. I'mnot often very long during the day, but noticed a LOT of new posters today - some with different names but in the same chat history. Kids playing around I also noticed that many of those type postings are now gone. Flagged ?? Don't remember seeing this one in the "Owkronym", but it sure has been asked a lot today - WDTSOOL "Why do they sleep on one leg?"

I have used the same name (mine) other than a few posts as 'guest' when I originally came on this site. However, the other day, I tried to put an avatar on (so others could tell it was me and not a 'smurf')..... but, after a few posts with the avatar, it disappeared, along with my history. Don't know what happened, but my hubby advised me to just leave it alone. Today, 13:11:17 - Flag - Like - Reply was in referene to a lot of 1 or 2 time posters I saw this morning that really didn't have anything to say, but just a few words of nonsense.                               This is what I have learned about barn owls:

                              The little eyeballs do not move
                              That is why the little head wobbles to and fro
                              They have 14 bones in their neck and we only have seven
                              The mother is darker in color/spots because she needs more camafloage
                             They spread their wings and give it a try at the rip age of 50 plus days.
                              They will leave the box at approximately 80 days
                              Sad to say - but yes it's true
                              the average life span is two years old in the wild.
                              But in a habitat they can live up to 20 and more.
                              They are cute, more than I ever expected
                             And can win a heart in less time than I ever thought.

                            Just a note about her "explanation": These owls here have shown no signs of "locking" their raised leg behind the other leg. That may be something some owls do, but it is not the reason birds can sleep and balance easily on one leg.
                            There was a very thorough explanation of the physiology behind this behavior posted here some time ago, and there is much more scientific info about it

       No they are not gone forever after having a post removed, or even several. That would be completely unrealistic and unfair. Just imagine those same kids flagging YOUR post. They get one removed (it has happened to me) then you would be left out in the cold. The system is designed to limit the frequent and senseless posting by bored or malicious people, not to silence someone for a disagreeable comment.

       James Hill (in de Corum)
      It takes several, from different users, to remove a single post.
       Then the system will block the user completely if they have several posts removed.
       At least that is my understanding.

       All you need to do is Flag and then Refresh your screen. It just takes a concerted effort by a few to clean things up. But the offending posts will not always disappear on their own, you need to refresh the page to see that. The funny thing is, the offenders can still see and reply to themselves if they don't refresh, and see their efforts, but no one else will.

Wow, their coloring is coming in nicely and fast. The mohawk on the head, aka, fluff, is leaving and the beautiful feathers are coming in to replace the fluff.

                        Have not been able to watch as much as I would have liked. Is the old dowel-porch still in existence? Couldn't quite tell last night. If so, could someone reach Carlos and see if he could replace it with a single dowel, about 1.25 inches in diameter? Maybe even a pair of such dowels? Make the brackets out of something like 2x2's, with chamfered edges (he's got a good shop, so that would be no problem). James, I think you noticed the same thing I'mseeing - the adults don't much care for the dowels or the too-thin brackets. Very poor footing. These owls have large feet and would benefit from a substantial support. This would be particularly useful for when the owlets try to venture from the \ensuremath{\mathsf{box}} .

                                The "porch" is still there.
                                I'm not positive, but I think Carlos mentioned in the other chat that he realizes that the multiple dowels was not a good approach.
                                See photos on the Molly blog of the new perch which he put above one of the cameras. It is a 2x2 with chamfered edges. It fits Molly's feet pretty well and she has perched on it a few times. Don't know if he'll make adjustments to the "porch" or not, but I wouldn't put it past him.

                                James - yes, thanks, I saw the 'camera perch'. Seriously, if someone could reach him, he could probably build it today. People tend to misunderstand branching: what owls need are thick branches. Also, as few twigs as possible. The wingspan is what? - over 3 ft? Look at all the perches the adults prefer: roof of the owl box, the kestrel box, various and sundry ladders, the T-bar, the camera. Molly did use the tree, but it was that branch, sticking out - horizontally. In every case, solid footing and lots of 'empty air' - no chance of damaging the flight feathers. Sorry to be a nag, but that 'porch' could be replaced with something very, very useful.

                                Lagree with you completely. While watching the adults the last few nights, I paid close attention to where they landed. They often avoided the porch all together, and when they didn't they seemed off balance and took flight quickly to recover. I know someone from here who has a contact with Carlos, so I'll try to forward the message/thoughts to him.

                                That would be great! And I completely agree with your observations - was watching for exactly that last night. Managed to stay awake for the first 3 deliveries. The porch is a pain at best. Signing off for now, back later \stackrel{f w}{=}
