Below is a little large/better version of the collage I put together last night. Feel free to copy, save, and share.

Note, I didn't capture all the images myself. Kathryn also gets the credit, they are mostly her screen caps.

I've also put a smaller version on the wiki, if you want to use it on the timeline, Latrippi.

Sorry for omitting that last night, but I was both dog-tired and a just little excited.

So after all the anticipation and worry about the 'porch' it was interesting to see Max bypass that and go directly to the perch. NOW I will watch in anticipation of more than one owl trying to get out of the box at once. My concern is about the porch Carlos added when people were concerned about owlets falling out of the nest. It seems almost slippery when Molly has tried to grip it. Today, 07: 42:27 - Flag - Unlike - Reply

He used the porch (for balance?) with his left foot, going back in the first time.

Latrippi Cat that's true. Going out and back in, both times, the porch dowels are like stepping stones.

First time out he doesn't go directly to the perch but tries a dowel on the porch and, yes, it seems slippery alright! Today, 07:45:00 - Flag - Like - Reply

I'm sure those owls have been on slippery tree branches after it's rained, don't think we have anything to worry about, they seem to have gotten this far without our intervention. Today, 07:45:36 - Flag - Like - Reply

Thanks so much for the links Merritt!!! I am gushing over our baby boy!! I want to call my family members to brag, but they already think I'm nuts.

Yes, Owlo. The dowels used in that porch are too small in diameter and too slick for the owls to get a good grasp on. They are also spaced a little too dose together, given the ginormous size of the owls feet. Lissanne and I were discussing that a few days ago when Molly and McGee were both having difficulty keeping their footing/balance on the porch. I noticed the same thing last night with Max. He did use the porch for support once, but only as a reflexive action when he lost his balance. He didn't appear to be too excited about actually using it on purpose. Lastly, with it being so close to the owl box, there isn't enough roomfor the owls to actually stand on it without either their head or tail being crammed right up against the box. They're much

                    What I love in the video (Max on the perch) is the clear apprehension/puzzlement of the owlet in the box: there's an owl on the perch....it's not Mom......it's not Dad......not going anywhere near that door until the situation is resolved.....

                    Still thinking about the first time they go out of the box. It is a brand new skill to grasp the perch with their talons.. they have only walked on the floor the box.. nothing to practice on in there.

                    Just an opinion: I've looked at both of the youtube videos and I'mconvinced it's the same owl. That second branching is so confident it really looks like it's not the owl's first time. And that white patch on the right wing/shoulder appears to be exactly the same on both owls.

Just read that they fledge at 8 weeks old.. And the dad stays with them and feeds themand teaches themhow to hunt.. While the femal at this time may have started a second clutch of eggs at this time.

time to put the flag out, take the dogs out and get ready for church service, see you all later

Wonder how soon we can tell male from female? "Max" looks all white front but, that may change I think. Wonder how old they are when they have their "true" Today, 05: 41:24 - Flag - Like - Reply feathers, only the owls know for sure what sex they are! Sometimes we don't know for sure until the first mating season!

They won't have their "true" colors until all their adult feathers come in. I kept "true" in quotation marks like you did because even with all the adult

I'd say it's the same owlet for both outings, based on behavior. Think of it in terms of your own baby - may take them a long time to do something for the first time, but once they ve done it, they're unstoppable and the new skill is quickly repeated, over and over and over again 😃 Today, 05:36:38 - Flag - Like - Reply Liked by Werritt Poots Cheryl Greenway Owen @Barbara Dangbar GS

Merritt - that is usually the pattern. It takes them time to build up the 'courage' to move away from the nest cavity. So it's a lot of back and forth, back and forth, back and forth at first. Also, note that the owlet does not care for the 'fledge ledge' at all - poor footing (pieces of wood too thin). It quickly moves to the perch which has a good diameter. That's why I suggested (in the sub-sub-basement by now) that the porch be replaced by something more substantial. M&M have also been avoiding the porch, for the same reason.

       Funny thing is, I have been sound asleep. I just woke up and ordinarily wouldn't post anything until I've caught up on the chat, but I happened to see Lucky's beautiful whale avatar, read her post, and couldn't resist letting her know that I'mhere! What was all the excitement about? Did I miss Max stepping out?

       Yep! ... and there is some dispute as to whether Max stepped out for a second time or whether it was Pattison - I'm undecided - although my initial thought is that it was definately Max - and despite checking every picture that I and several other people took - I'm still not sure!

                     I just read an interesting book by a Naturalist who picked up a baby horned owl in the woods. It's his Diary of his time with the owl. Very nice read and fast, read it last night before going to sleep. Interesting, observations of the owls behavior. He sent it to a reb. site to have them train it to hunt so it could be released but the owl was "incorrigible" and they decided to keep it for demonstration so he took it back. Turns out the owl was depressed and homesick! The

                    The way I saw it, Max did his first branching and stayed out for about 15 min an went back in. During that time, Pattison stayed in the front of the opening and sometimes looked as though he wood make an attempt. Fl nally, Max came up on hileft side and nudged him away and then Max jumped right to the perch as though it was old hat.
                    Did I miss Pattison himself going out?

Snoring...great reality check! Gets  $\mathbf{me}$  every time.

I have a feeling M & M have been carefully watching this whole thing and perhaps are withholding treats to encourage them.

OK, that's it for me. Hubby is snoring in the easy chair, I need to get us both upstairs to bed. Night Owk!
