Live Barn Owl Nest Box Cam - San Marcos, CA

This is a live feed of a wild female barn owl named Molly. The owl box is located 15 feet off the ground. The male (McGee) has a white chest and face. He usually shows up after dark but has spent an entire day with the female. For more information about the owls and this cam. Click Here Click Here to "Like" us on Facebook.

hope you all will indulge for a moment, but I so wanted to share my experience last night. Last night, for me, was both exhilarating and comical. It was so much fun to watch the 2 owlets test their wings last night and see that one was a little more adventurous than the other. I think it was Patison that was a little bolder last night and at one point had miscalculated and ended up grabbing at the pole and then sliding down. We then didn't see her/she for awhile and began wondering if everything was okay to only see a great big old wing come across the camera. He/she had been perched on top of the camera all along. What a hoot! This has been so much more than I expected!

This is going to be a somewhat long post so please forgive me, but I have been thinking about this for a long time. My background is in the social and organizational fields and I've been experiencing the Molly phenomenon through a bit of a professional lens!

I wonder if anybody realizes that the people here are being watched as closely as the owlets. What I mean is, this is a remarkable online phenomenon and there are people (mostly sociologists I would expect) who are studying it, and will be studying it in the future, to try to learn from it. For example there are two different types of chat rooms, a threaded and an unthreaded one, with completely different resulting social systems. There are repercussions on (and by) other people outside the group (Stacey et al). Participants have taken on different roles within the group, and some of those roles are extremely strong ones.

Carbs and Donna themselves have managed the situation in a way that is actually being considered to be "pioneering" in the online world, with multiple channels developing, physical changes in the owl environment and the technical environment, plus their own rather wonderful personalities which are quite different from many online site managers. They should get some kind of recognition for how they have handled it because online professionals are learning from it.

People in graduate school could get dissertations out of this. And I wouldn't be surprised if this becomes teaching material at more than one college... technical, social, even business courses.

The best thing about it is the evolution it has gone through (and that many of us have personally gone through). For at least a short time, perspectives have changed, worlds have enlarged, and interpersonal behaviors have changed too, both online and (I'm certain!) in people's off-line existences.

I really, really believe that the world is a bit of a better place because of all of this, and that its impact will persist in all sorts of ways. Even if tragedy happens within this little owl family, the big-picture outcome will be good.

I hope people here are trying to be aware of how it has changed him or her. And, too, how he or she can take the growth and learning further and make more changes come out of it. It's a pretty terrific thing to have been a part of.

Ingrid, It's mostly a good thing. The problems will come when generalizations are made about a small group and then applied to a larger population where it may not be true. We have voluntary group here and not a randomly chosen one. Already we know there are some who prefer people here (like Trystan and some other who identify themselves as rehabilitators, etc) and others who observe wildlife and those who are brand new to the idea of watching nature.

Researchers will need to make some assumptions about why certain people may not have responded to a question (were they online?, did they choose to ignore?, did they have invisible post problems? and that sort of thing) and of course those guesses are just that. (That doesn't mean there isn't valuable data to be gathered about a large-ish group of strangers who have come together for the common interest/curiosity of watching owls.)

I often wonder how many of my friends here would actually be my friends in real life. We have this one interest in common yet there is latent agreement that we don't talk about other subjects much (although things have been shared outside of owl topics). I really enjoy this forum myself.

Of course. The fact that this is a self-selected group (or, actually, several self-selected groups) is one of the interesting parts. This isn't an experiment, it's a case study at best. One hopes that nobody will be running away with conclusions, but that there will be insights (as opposed to even faintly drawn from a cross-section, which doesn't even faintly apply.)

My first chatroom experience was in approximately 1992, when I became part of CNN's Old Race Relations Discussion Board. The board was moderated (I myself was a moderator for a time), but the postings were not pre-screened. The dialogue remained to a semi-vident level at all times. The subject matter was obviously radically different from the one here. As moderators, we were in a constant race to delete posts and could never really keep up. CNN finally shut that board (and others like it) down. Since those days, I have participated in chats of widely-varying sorts, most of which have had considerable "punch". This one has remained amazingly civil, dare I say, predictable. And it appears to be self-polishing, even though not all of us are here by any means for the same reasons. I am not familiar with that dynamic occurring naturally. What do the professionals say?

Hi, SWFL. 2 owlets have stepped out at night and are learning how to fly, but they are back in the box with the other 2 now. All four will continue to live until they are about 80 days old, or about mid-June. Then they will fly away and not come back. M&M will continue to provide for them up until that time.

Max and Pattison are getting their flight on! It takes a lot of practice for a barn owl to learn how to maneuver and separate a 42 inch wing span on those relatively little bodies. Last night, Max's flights were full of power as he would launch himself into the air and soar with a minimum of flapping. Pattison's still in the choppy awkward phase, but both were all over the place last night. One even took a tumble to the ground trying to climb up the backside of the perch, but remerged on the scene from the right side of the viewing screen where he might have dimbed up on the fence and launched himself to the top of the box from there. Gasps and sighs of wonder and relief could be heard around the world all night long.

Thanks for those dramatic and interesting updates. I wonder what predators might be lurking to hopefully find and capture young owl fighting to get airborne and in control of himself. It must be scary for Molly and McGee to view their struggle. And yet, I wonder if they are nearby to attack whatever might think they could get a hold on one of the young owls. Any input on these things?

Hi Beverly. Barn owls really don't have many predators as long as they are safely up off the ground, so if these owlets can stay up high, they should stay rather safe. Molly and McGee are both in the area all night long, and the owlets call out to them from dusk to dawn. I would bet that if they raised an alarmcry, one of their parents would come to check things out.

Thanks, Merritt! How reassuring, and how alike they are to so many animals as well as humans. What a beautiful picture of parental love and protection. And those young owls' faces. They are absolutely beautiful! And I bet they do have to really learn how to handle that wing span and learn to target prey and get to it. Actually it is awesome what is going on right now with those babies.

A few night ago when they stepped out of the box we could hear a loud "whooshing" sound, long and expirational, like an open oxygen tank (sorry, work in the medical field 😊); had never heard that sound before, and someone said it was the parents' "protective hissing". So much to see and learn. Nature is a wonder.

Beverly, far from being an authority on OWLS, I would guess that Molly watches the young ones from a distance in an effort to avert the scenario you laid out in your post re: predators. I can only hope that's the case. Makes sense though.

I know they need to learn to do these things for themselves, but how horrible for the critter to be captured alive, flown through the air and thrust into a hoard of hungry owls. I've been hearing a couple of owls in our back yard lately. Yesterday I saw a rabbit hopping across the road and all I could think of was...well, there goes an evening meal. Unfortunately, that is the reality of a rodent's life. They breed prolifically because their mortality is so high. I once read a naturalist describe them as 'fast food' for a huge range of predators. They are absolutely essential for the survival of those predators. Today, 05:04:17 - Flag - Like - Reply Liked by Dawn R, Lynda C, Bette

He takes them from his kitchen which is 100 to 150 feet (I've heard both distances mentioned) away from the box.

He has a good camera and a good lens, with a regular flash, which does not seem to bother the owls.

someone help... My vision isn't the greatest... The pic looks blurry to me. I can tell that's an owl on the perch, but there looks to be a 2nd (perhaps on a tree?) in the foreground... Am I going nuts or is that what I'm seeing?

...and on top of that, Carlos has said repeatedly that he has no desire to change any names because they are all named specifically after important people in his life. What the heck does anyone care what the names are anyway?
Moonbat, Billybob, Billy Jean, and Wilbur would have worked just as well.
