Have you ever read or heard of Louise Dickinson Rich. She wrote "We Took to the Woods", "My Neck of the Woods" and others about the years she lived in a very remote location in Maine with her husband and had two children there. I wouldn't call her a literary genious, but her stories of the Maine woods are wonderful and insightful. Times were tough for them and their only income at times was from her stories and books. Not difficult reading at all and nothing very scientific, she just told what she saw. One of my favorite expressions came from one of her books - "listening to the quiet".

Hi Everybody! I'm checking in for the nigh shift but also want to let you know I'mgoing out of town tomorrow and won't back in the chat room with you until Sunday. I have decided not to take my lapt op with me since the whole point of my trip is to be with a lot of my friends from college! It's the annual Reunions weekend at Princeton University, and there's no way I can party and visit with them and watch the owls, too. I have thought about it, but know that I amnow way too old to get away with trying to do both! I wouldn't survive the weekend if I did.
I wanted to let my "late afternoon/evening" chat friends know that I'll be gone the next three nights in case you start missing me and wonder where I am. I'll be here for the rest of tonight, but then I won't chat with you again until Sunday. I will miss you while I'm gone! 😃

        Exactly !!! We do have a few more cars pass by, but not many 😃 I can often go from my house to the little village about 4-1/2 miles away and not

I apologize for posting this now when things are getting busy, but my post of about an hour ago somehow disappeared. It was on the tail end of an important conversation. (and sorry, but it's a 2 parter; the next part is directly below.) This is only my opinion, but it's important to me. It seems to me that what has made this particular chat roomso special is that all of our friendships have come about because we are together sharing the biggest thing we have in common - our love of and fascination with the life cycles of creatures we share this planet with. This is what has brought us together and, I feel, is what will keep us together. All of our friendships emanate out from this core. I don't think a simple chat room could ever take its place.

        n the past I ve watched web cams of Peregrine Falcon Nests and Red-tail Hawk nests. They were exhilirating, Iif e-changing experiences for me -- but I never had anyone to share them with. This room, this experience we've had, makes all the difference in the world to me. The only thing that is better than being able to experience something like this is to be able share it with someone else. And in the process, find our common bonds. So my vote is to follow HF's suggestion, stay in this chat room and find us a good ol' raptor family to keep company with.

Mary Laura, I had a fabulous and lasting hookup with friends that I grew to know intimately online for years before we ever met. It was wonderful!
        And now, I know a number of young couples who've met on sites such as match.com, who seem to have made wonderful choices. My middle nephew met and married a young woman through match.com a few years ago. She and her large family have become such a part of us that we don't know how we ever lived without them. This is the positive side of the Internet!

                           I would consider a forest motif wallpaper remodeling, for after the owlets move out Something with grays and greens to complement their color, and a simple yet random pattern to hide the unavoidable stain or twelve.
                           Maybe paint the pole to look like a vine. It could start a whole new craze in interior nest box design.

                           Diana, I'm sure that comment was funny. - But I must confess to being willfully ignorant of Oprah's designers or guests.

So I amheaded out of town this weekend (I think) would it be frivolous to buy a netbook to take with me so I could run down to the only wifi spot 7.5 miles from where I will be so I can catch a glimpse of the owls? James do you make reviews on computers? I picked one out to replace my 9 year old one. Would love

         QVC has computers for sale as specials quite often. You also have 30 days to use it and return it with no restocking fee just the cost of the return postage. They often offer payments on computers. That may be an idea for you. Good luck on your quest.

         No, I gave up reviewing PCs. For. Ever.
         The manufacturers change model numbers and the tiniest component details every week, just to keep everyone confused. It's come down to doing thorough research online before you buy. Unfortunately by the time you do the research, things are different already. But you really can't go wrong with most name brand systems today unless you have very specific requirements in mind. I will vouch for my favorite place to buy. newegg.com is a geeks paradise on computer equipment. Good prices and great service. Many, many knowledgeable folks write great reviews on components and hardware there. These are folks who do a lot of building their own computers. Check the mout.

This is a re-post from this morning. Sorry to post it again, but since several of our computer experts are here at the moment, I thought I'd run it by them:
I know many of you are wishing, as I am, that there were some way to stay together after the owls leave (a week or so?). For me, the fellowship of this group has been at least as big a reason to be here as watching the owls... I know lots of you feel the same. So I'm wondering if anyone has ideas about how we could do that—if I had the computer expertise to set up a chat roomor something, I would. But alas, it was about all I could do just to get an avatar!
Any thoughts on how this might be done?

         It's a good idea, Carrie. Someone else suggested it this morning. But I think we'd have to choose one of the raptor cams because the song birds are out

        I don't believe moving to another bird site in this same domain is a good long-term solution. All these sites come and go as the animal families grow and leave their nests.
         There are a zillion sites that provide real-time chatroom hosting with varying degrees of sophistication. Some are free, some are not. A question I would have going in is what is the common thread that holds people together here. My sense is that it is the owls. I don't know what other degree of likemindedness there may be. My gut tells me there are many individual pockets of like-mindedness, some of which might be quite small. One of the keys to this board's success has surely been the quasi-complete avoidance of topics that could be even remotely controversial.

It would be a relatively simple matter for someone here with moderate computer skills to select a chatroomhost, and get a chatroom up and running, if that's the route people want to go.

         Lots of truth in that, Elliott--I've wondered the same thing myself (about the need for a common thread). I've never been in a chat room before this,

Natalie, you said that Hunting/Fishing advised you to just stay put. Did he tell you this link would be up after Carlos shut the owl cam down? I would've have the feeting up the is a no brainer to use, and everyone thought this stream would also disappear. If it is staying up, then let's just stay here. It has the features we like, is a no brainer to use, and everyone Again, I would still wonder what the common interest will become once the owls are gone. I've never been in a chatroomt hat did not center on a particular interest, whether a social cause, a hobby, an artistic interest, or something else that was common to all the participants.

Owlbominable, did you see the At lants land today? My station switched news stories in the middle (which disappointed me) but I thought of the folks here when Sorry, I just saw the question. I've had Facebook people "bugging me" all afternoon.

LOL - that reminded me a of a few adults I know! (the kid, not the dad)

Oh, hey there Chris!

(just kidding folks, you weren't bugging me.)

The nerve of some people! LOL

Kathryn R

James, if you are around I compressed all the HUGE chatstreams out there again. I did not replace the links this time. Also, I think I missed one but I don't have the concentration right now to figure out which one it was. After you do the links and delete the duped large files we should know.

                           No. We make guesses, but it usually isn't obvious until the owlets are about a year old and they will be long gone by then.

                           My wrens took over an early bluebird nest this season (I've evidence they left at the scene --- their feathers). My bluebirds had to start over. So, I placed a house for the wrens where they liked to sleep (my front porch) and I'mhappy to report both bluebirds and wrens are coexisting amicably.

Neat to think - they can go out of box now, 3/4ths can fy - perhaps even catch own food .. however, they still "come home" for the day! 😃

Look how healthy they are!. Molly & McGee are great parents. Carlos a good surogate, I'm mean providing the box and all...

                          You've every reason to be proud, Bette! That's fantastic. Living not too far north in Hattiesburg, I've several friends with children who've volunteered in a beginner/amateur taking photos can create beautiful works of art. What separates a lot of so called average shots from really good shots is simply the processing and editing work done after the capture.

                          http://www.voutube.com/watch?v= ve4M4UsJQo
                          It was a ad for Honda a few years ago. All shot in one long sequence, with no trick photography, to the best of my recollection.
                          The tires rolling up hill caused many to disbelieve early on, but the producers provided a "making of" video to show how it was done. Weights inside the top of the tires.

                          Thanks, James--it's great! I actually like that one better in a way because of having no music. For some reason, the music on the other one doesn't "fit" to me. Plus, there may be trick photography involved...I really don't know.

                          My mistake above. According to the filmmaker, the Honda piece was split into two long sections due to the space constraints of the room. They went up one side of the room and down the other, then edited the two pieces together. But, it took around 650 "takes" to get it all setup properly. 😃 the making of - http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Kh4zWeUDW-E I liked the music video, as a music video. It is surly different than most, and it does appeal to my nerdy side.

                   HAVING WATCHED THESE DARLINGS SINCE THEY HATCHED, IT SEEMS TO BE THAT THEY MIGHT HAVE MITES. THEY PRIMP THEIR FEATHERS CONSTANTLY, WHEN AWAKE.
                   IT IS EASY TO ATTACH AN ANTI MITE MEDICATION TO THE OUTSIDE OF THE BOX AND ILL BET THE PRIMPING SLOWS DOWN. 😃

      Lagree. It hink they are overreacting on the camera flashes. The flashes seem very bright but we have to remember, infrared / night cameras will reflect a brighter light than what is actual. Carlos mentioned something before about the cameras being more than 40 ft away or so (verification needed Emily was correct below. There were egos hurt on both sides. On the subject of money, I don't think Carlos is making a lot of money for the effort he put on for us. So what if he is trying to make money? The guy is retired and has every right to do so. People have the option not to buy. Stacey is making money on her experience with Wesley. I don't see any difference between the two.

       The guy is working 18 hours a day on his owl project. I don't know what his donations to his personal cash stash have been, but it's probably not even minimum wage. And he's spent a ton on equipment.

Re: Stacey O'Brien
I'ma relatively new poster here, and really grateful for the opportunity to spend so much time with these delightful animals. I haven't spent any time in the yahoo group, but I did read through many of Stacey's blog posts. I think that she is sincere in her concern for owls, and her focus on the San Marcos box is partially because of its notoriety. She sees this as an opportunity to talk about owl boxes in general.

       The main issue I think Stacey has is with owl-box-for-profit businesses, who are selling what she considers to be a dangerous and insufficient replacement for natural habitat. That's a legitimate concern. The argument that the owls would not have chosen this spot if it were dangerous doesn't work for me; animals try to raise their babies in places that are dangerous all the time. And even if the additions she pushed for are not necessary, isn't it all to the good if they make the environment safer for the owlets? It's not like they add greatly to the expense. And the goal to produce more healthy owls, is it not?

      Since I wasn't reading then I don't know the circumstances around her departure from the chat room, so I can't comment on how she behaved here. It saddens me that there is bad blood, because I honestly believe that both Carlos and Stacey love owls and want the best for them. They just have some disagreements about what "the best" is. That and I think ego got involved on both sides, which never works out prettily. There's no call for her to harass him via e-mail or by posting his address; there is no call for him to misrepresent what she's said and call her scientific background into question.

      I know this post may come off as very pro-Stacey, but that's because this is a very pro-Carlos space. I don't think that the things being said on either

Emily - Stacey wrote some very disturbing things about Carlos but then removed them from her site - I wish I had never read them. I assume she had time to think about it and realized how she sounded and that she might be liable for saying such things. If you decide to go onto her blog and "argue for an understanding of Carlos' position" I wish you the best. Let us know how that goes...

Our first hummers (we only have the ruby-throated) arrived right on schedule (Mother's Day) here in Maine. I started with just a little sugar/water nectar. The females are now here so have the feeders full. By June I will be going through over a quart a day and then the babies fledge it often goes up to 1-1/2 qts. and more each day. I just love their antics.

       Hi, Ruth! I'mglad you're here. Yeah, your orioles were probably just passing through, looking for a little fuel for the journey. All of the tremendous east coast migrations have been on the early side this year. I haven't a clue why - probably if we look back on a hundred years of historical migration history On another note, Ruth - I have a site that I think you're really going to love. It's a site where you can do a virtual owl-pellet dissection online!! The site is for kids, but no less fun and educational for adults. I did one this morning! Here it is (it was originally posted by Dave the Owl Man's wife Diana. (not

       Jan, I would suspect the early migration is due, at least in part, to the fact that it's been one of the warmest springs ever in New England. Allour birds were sure early this year anyway.

      Us too, Natalie, but it's not warmweather that instigates their migration. It's warm where they're coming from, and they have no idea that it's warmso early up here. The migration is initiated by several factors: position of the sun, amount of daylight, magnetic pull, experience and perhaps cyclical changes in wind direction. So it really is a mystery - at least to our uninitiated thinking.

When I was a kid (many, many moons ago!), my Dad nailed several small bird houses to different trees and telephone poles that bordered on our property.
Every spring and summer these houses were always populated by a variety of small birds..... robins, sparrows, cardinals, etc. I will never forget how WONDERFUL it was when, about once a week, my Dad would put up the tall ladder near every box and let us kids climb up to have a peek inside at the nest, then the eggs, then the little babies. The adult birds would be flying around squawking loudly for this intrusion, but just for those 20 or 30 seconds of peeking I was left with an incredible knowledge, love and respect for our feathered friends. cont'd...

I wish everyone could have a little perspective for both sides. Carlos' efforts to raise money might not appeal to all, but what's the harm? The fellow has invested time and money and look at how everyone has benefitted - we in enjoyment and education, and the owls seem to me to be as safe as in "natural" environment. Nature is not synonymous with safety. Carlos has said many times he's not an expert, and maybe he hasn't gotten everything just right, but hasn't he educated all of us nonetheless? And haven't Max, Pattison, Austin and Wesley had a pretty good shot at life so far? Today, 13:51:18 – Flag – Like – Reply

Sure! But an open mind has to recognize that even those good efforts are really tampering with nature. Devil's advocate here - the more we help the barn owls, the more right the mouse advocates have to seethe in anger at us for tipping the natural balance! The argument could go on and on. So, I Ve rambled. I just want to put in a plug to thank Carlos, Donna, Stacey and everyone who cares for the owls in any way. And I want to toss out a gentle request that everyone's idea of what's helpful, how to help, and what is allowable interference/advocacy vs. dangerous meddling can be very different. Yes, I confess that I think the BOA crowd is more focused on the negative than this crowd, but I don't want my little soapbox speech to come across as bashing anybody. Let's all sing kumba yah and be glad we have barn owls to share this great planet with. Today, 13:51:53 – Flag – Like – Reply

I was glad I read through some of the most serious chat discussions today so I can be in the loop. Just think, if we decide to "meet" again at another web cam the volunt eers who keep up the Molly wiki site, copy the pdf's, etc. can take a break & will have more of a chance to sit, enjoy and chat. Be back later and hope to stick to my new motto -" enjoy; be friendly; be happy and don't sweat the small stuff when it comes to those who like to come here to rile us up" !!

                    truth time, since I'm feeling sentimental, and these owlets will be fully fledged early June, so -- I feel very guilty checking in here while being unemployed -- but being unemployed since before Christmas, in this crappy market, makes the joy of seeing these owlets play and sleep and feel and groom and chatter, and even

                          Don't feel guilty about checking in here, Bette. I feel that to be a fully-realized human being, we MUST be in touch with this part of our world. I lost my job almost two years ago, and at my age I'mnever going to get anything like it again. But I came to realize what a huge part of life I was missing out on as I lived my life in a busy, homocentric world. We need these experiences for our sprits to break loose.

I'm glad that you have let your "spirits break loose", Jan. In this hectic, busy world we live in it is all too easy to let those finer things of life pass us by.
                           We only come this way but once and we should all "savor the moment" & "stop and smell the roses" (or peonies, or ???), even if it only for a few minutes each day.

 I think Ms. StaceyO'Brien, yahoo, should check with Molly and Max. After all, they chose their home over a tree. I'm sure they knew what was best for their babies. What's going to happen if and when any owl chooses a tree that doesn't fit her criteria? The owlets might fall out, oh no! Just leave it alone. Jealousy gets you NO where. Carlos has done a fantastic thing. FYI, the coastal plains are very cool and to think that the box is hot, ventilation, which I can see, gives them what they need. Oh, dear the circle of life. What to do. An owlet gets carried away. There she goes, criticizing the intelligence of Max and Molly. Heaven forbid if her child should fall down and get hurt. Oh, she had better watch out, they might fall into the human race. So sorry Stacey, NO

Good thoughts. I wonder what she/they would do if the owl chose a church bell tower, an open 3rd story loft in a barn, etc. where the nearest outside tree might be 25 to 100 feet away. Some people aren't happy unless they have a "cause" to gripe about. I am certain in my own mind that Carlos will never do this again. He must know this is going on and it must be SO hurtful to him. To disagree and intellidentsly suggest is perectly fine - but to lurk in Ya'LL have good thoughts and intentions, i have bitten my lip so many times it is bloodied and hanging right now, never in my whole life have i seen such hostility wrongly directed. What is really sad, SO'B could of use this as a platform to justifiably help her cause, but she choose a very negative path to do so. Even now her supporters and followers think that she had been unjustly criticized.

              Personally, i am a active political activist and i am so relieved to see people thinking on their own and processing what they see and hear and forming opinions rather than just assuming. Life offers no guarantee to any species, we can just hope and do what we can to promote good practices, but mother nature always has a natural means for eliminating the weaker. My apologies if i offend anyone but these are just my thoughts and opinions.

Hi! I used to walk the woods with a biologist to find owl or goshawk pellets that contained ruffed grouse bands. The pellets were quite large, and contained hair and bones - and sometimes the aluminum bands we banded the ruffed grouse with.

By the way, your hydrangea makes me smile every time I see it. Do you have a large version that I could save?

I did Bette, and there is a variety called "Nikko" that is typically more intense in coloration than Endless Summer. My photo almost looks like the color of a Nikko, doesn't it? It is actually an Endless Summer, but it's planted in a great spot that gets the perfect amount of sun and shade. 😃 love your blue hydrangeas...did you ever see my question about another blue, maybe called Nico?

I love the size of their heads now in relation to their legs and body. Especially this angle.

that's it! I have the tag somewhere -- planted Sept 2005 in Chatham, and they're thriving ... every year I add the aluminum something, and good mulch...there's small dogwood too, as a memorial garden for an old friend of mine who died that summer Pat Henning would have loved these owlets, and probably told me about them first

Hi Kayla. After they disperse and pursue their own separate lives, the bond they had in the owl box will be gone. For a while they may 'recognize' each other, but not in the sense that we would recognize our brother and sisters - that is, with emotion attached. They don't need to - it doesn't help their survival in any way.

                    This site has done more to educate people all over the world about owls and all wildlife than any site i have ever visited before. So many more people now are aware of the delicate balance of nature and our environment and how we are the care takers of this planet.

Just an example of what we have learned through this experience: it was common belief that owls DO NOT sleep flat on their tummies, sides or backs.
                          But now we know they actually do!! And we have plenty of photos to prove it.

                                 1. There's this comment page where we talk to each other forming a sense of community and a shared awe.
                                 2. Carlos comes on occasionally to answer questions in his folksy way
                                3. If I'm like everyone else, it's almost impossible to explain the experience except that I amgrateful to be a witness to this phenomenom.
                                 4. I feel as though there is harmony and love in this journey together.
                                 5. We are excited to see our babies grow and will be sad when they have flown off to their own journeys.

2 minutes on this is probably too long - I THINK their problem was Carlos' artificial construction & worry about lack of limbs to gradually branch to.
                                 However, I think they may have twisted things because it sounded like (from the blog, that's as far as I wanted to go) "they" "the scientists & experts" had to convince Carlos to put up the playground, instead of getting that Carlos is learning along with the rest of us & is happy to do what is in the best interest of these owls. No amount of good points that may have carries much value when done in such a fashion, in my opinion; let's not spend time on

                        TO EVERYONE.....I made this "cowllage" as sort of the universal experience we've been sharing watching the owl box. It is made as a gift. I know a lot of people have the capability to do a screen shot and print it on their own. I'd like Carlos to consider selling prints of it on card stock or even as a page in his book.
                        What's the best way to bring this to his attention. I could probably print some out and sell them on Ebay under "Molly Collage" for the Month of June and send all profits to Carlos. Any ideas? Kathleen

I think you need to send Carlos an email. He's said many times all his images are copyrighted. You can share them freely with friends, but you can not use them for monetary gain without his permission. Certainly do not put anything on ebay!

They are a group of people that if they didn't have this to complain and moan about, they would find something else. To make it worse, they do it behind the pretense that they are do-gooders. They are very much like PETA, they take a noble cause (safer owl boxes) and then ruin it by all their nastiness

Owlbominable Snowman (a.k.a..JH) Yes, I did see that. Both in your comment and on their group postings. They have very little sense of reality and even less knowledge of how the legal systemactually works. For cringing out loud, many of them keep insisting that owls are Property of the federal government and not simply protected by the laws enacted by the government! lol. They got that one directly from their lead biologist. 😃 Some people have a very hard time understanding the facts when it comes to interpreting "legal mumbo jumbo" of the actual federal law

                                  Well, I missed the snail, so I guess I'mnot that observant! Holly, when I lived in the West Village in Manhattan, I had a beautiful roof deck 4 stories up.
                                  Up one side of the building and across my deck grew a wisteria vine that was 5.5-6 inches in diameter! A previous tenant had put high, thin iron props underneath it to allow it to grow across without obstructing movement around the deck. In the summer, the foliage shaded the deck in a beautiful fashion, and the flowers drooped everywhere. I discovered that the wisteria had been planted by the original builders in 1843!

They can get very big and heavy - but they're quite resilient - we had a bit of a disaster with this one over the winter as the foot of snow that fell on it.

                           Becky (and others), I won't repost those images but, for an interesting book at some folks following this board, with objectives and mentality much different than many here, you can join the Barn Owl Alliance yahoo group. http://bit.ly/BarnOwlAlliance
                           I would encourage anyone wishing to see what some others are saying about this nest box, these owls, and the efforts Carlos has put forth, to sign up for the conversations over there. You must register to read the posting going on there. They apparently do not want just anyone to be able to read what they are writing. Shame really, because they apparently use this open and public SPO chat, and the PDF files generated by us here, to keep up to date with what's going on.

                           Keep in mind, this group over there, was the first group that tried to get Carlos to add additional ways for the owls to perch on. Carlos has been somewhat short with them and even banned a few of them. I, for one, am grateful that they got Carlos to add the additional perches, as the tree Carlos kept claiming was close enough, wasn't. So, yes they can be brash, even maybe rude, but they have been banned by simply asking questions and trying to educate folks. A lot of owl boxes ARE installed improperly and they want to change that for the better, so I applaud them.

                           Susan, they are about much more than the perches Carlos added. And no one, not any respected biologist, could convincingly argue that tragedy would have resulted if he didn't add the perches, unlike many in that group. Wild owls have been evolving for a very long time without the assistance of man made perches. I suggest you read some of the vitriol and baseless speculation going on in that group. It's ridiculous that a "reputable biologist" has any hand in the shenanigans they are posting over there. They are discussing posting the man's home address and unlisted phone number, and disrupting the two owlbox chats. That is not a respectable thing to be involved in.

                           Ive been following her blog, and yesterday joined the yahoo group out of curiosity, and reading quickly through it I realized that Stacy doesn't seem to be too active compared to her followers. She's definatley stiring themup, but I can't tell how much she'[s participating. I don't know if you know, but she has a brain tumor and had a number of strokes and is on a lot of medications. (I read her book, too)
                           I agree with them that adding a perch to the box design sounds like a good idea, just from what I've seen here and on you tube, and read on the Barn Owl Trust website. But I don't agree with how they went about badgering and abusing chat rooms. I also don't think the camera flashes are bothering the owls. It's pretty clear the owlets are aware of them, but they really don't look like they mind in the least.

                          Also-from what I read on their yahoo group, they were giving out Carlos' address and phone number so their members could put it on the letters and forms they were sending to "the authorities" to complain about the box and the camera flash. It didn't sound like they were using his info to suggest regular people harass him at his home address. I think they are just angry letter writers. Not terrorists.

                           I would like to see any person posting Carlos' info to also post their own, open and clear for anyone using the web to see. I think they may re-think that practice very quickly, regardless of their supposed intent. It's just a very bad thing to do. Rational thinking adults should know better.

Susan Lawyer...I can see the explanations and education they seem to want to provide however any amount of interest I had for their scientific knowledge went out the window when they went put the Royal farmily in harms way by posting their personal information. No one can defend themon

That is not all they are doing - they are writing letters to newspapers that publish anything about Molly discrediting Carlos - calling him a liar. They are going onto the discussion boards of these newspapers and writing horrible things about him and saying he is exploiting the owls. They want to impose the same restrictions they have in the UK - they will allow you to apply to sponsor an owl box but will not tell you where it isi located so you will not harass

                           They want to impose a $25,000 fine and a min. 6 month jail sentence for harassing the owls. They consider taking flash photos to be harassment. I fear all their efforts will result in an end to the wonderful weeks we've all enjoyed - watching Molly and McGee safely and securely raising their owlets. They are really going after Carlos and the man who built his owl box. They are reporting them to Fish and Wildlife and every other agency they can think of.

                           Cindy- Hopefully people at Fish and Game and whomever else the authorities are, have sensable heads on their shoulders. I don't think Carlos is in any danger from a bunch of riled up housewives in a letter writing campaign on the internet. What is sad is thre really should be regulation for setting up housing for these birds and because they are going at it like a bunch of headless turkeys, their message is lost.

                           Yes Chickadee - I hope you are right.... but if this newspaper campaign continues - I would not blame Carlos if he decided not to share the owl box with all of us again.... which would be a real loss and as my grandmother used to say - they are "cutting off their noses to spite their faces". IF they really want to help owls. Instead of increasing the knowledge of owls, love for barn owls, etc. They would be cutting off all that's happened these last months thanks to Carlos & Donna.

                           that it would stir things up again. So I guess that must be your reason! 🙂 I agree. I was just curious to what they said. As to civil and friendly replies, I

                    For James, For someone that has never used Photoshop, would you recommend Version 7 or getting the latest version 8? Just a novice/hobby photo person that love photography and using cameras. Since it is a little quiet in here, I thought I would ask you. Thanks in advance for your advice. It may help others on here who are considering purchasing Photoshop after being a part of this experience, etc. You always have such great advice on photography and computers!

                           I take it you're referring to Photoshop Elements, yes? Either one will be fine. If you have a no experience with PSE then it may be a little overwhelming to start with. I recommend Google's Picassa software for the casual photo editing and organizing. It's much less feature laden than PSE, but it is very sophisticated software and it makes finding, organizing, and basic editing a snap. I used it for a long time and installed it for my momto use. I like it a lot, it just doesn't jive well with my own library software, Adobe Lightroom. And, it's FREE.

                          Hi AZGuest! I thought I would throw my experience with Photoshop out to you as I just wanted it as a novice/hobby photo person too. Photoshop (I think) is quite expensive, so I started with Photoshop Elements, a scaled down version. It still has tons of things a person can use to edit photos, but it is still a learning experience. I just set a goal for myself to learn a new thing or two every day on it, and now, after many hundreds of hours on it, I just love it! There isn't any editing that I have wanted to do, that I can't do with Elements. Did you see the Polar Bear delivery that I did here? There are so many filters and special effects and tools that you can combine, that you can get as creative as you want. Anyway, I feel that was a great choice for me. 🙂

                          Colleen, that is fabubus advice! I Ve been a Photoshop user for a good 10 years or so, and never moved past release 7. But AZGuest, as a matter of principle, I would never buy an old version of any software (except Windows XP over Vista!). it's usually no longer supported by the vendor, 3rd parties aren't writing add-ons for it, etc. But Photoshop is huge! The newer CS (Creative Studio) releases have enough power for the most powerful power users, and have an equally daunting learning curve. Go for it, if you have a lot of time to devote to it. I actually really like Colleen's idea though.
                           James - I didn't mean to usurp your input to AZGuest's question.

                           I never mind a second, third, or fifteenth opinion added to my own. All are good replies and options are always good! 😃 There really are MANY very good photo editing packages out there. Some of the best ones are free and quite capable. I just tend to steer people to the easiest one to use and let them ask for more advanced stuff if/when they feel underpowered. PS is the industry standard, but it is so much overkill for many who ask about entering the world of editing/organizing. I gave up on PS when that hit CS4. I now use Adobe Lightroom as my main editor and image database manager. It is the one tool I do highly recommend to any serious digital photographer. Its organizing/batch editing methods are the benchmark standard, IMHO.

                           He can create a js-kit account, if he wants to remain active in the discussions for an extended period and retain his chat history. Otherwise, he could upload a avatar and just change the name field to whatever he wants, without logging in at all. He will not be able to keep a chat history that way, as it will clear after each time the browser is closed, most likely.

                    I've been thinking about some of my favorite moments from M&M&babies, and here are mine in no particular order:
                    1. Molly "discovering" the camera
                    3. McGee showing up with treat to find Molly gone from the nest \,
                    4. Molly rejecting the rabbit that McGee tried to hand her from the other side of the box.
                    5. Austin's first flight--he went directly from the box, never first going to the perch Feel free to add your favorites.

At tention: the following post and the one directly below it should clear up any questions about brood patches. This definition sums up quite nicely information found on other sites, and confirms what I have read in the past about them. Brood Patch By Melissa Mayntz, About.com Guide Definition: (noun) An area of featherless skin on a nesting bird's breast, abdomen or sides that has thicker skin and a higher concentration of blood vessels in order to more efficiently transfer the parent bird's body heat to the eggs that are being incubated. Many bird species develop brood patches, and either gender may develop one depending on whether or not the incubation duties are shared. Today, 10:13:00 - Flag - Like - Reply Liked by 😭 Dr. Web M.D (Adam Curry) 🎄 Bill in SD 🌋 Rhonda Hargrove 🝱 Dorothy Jan (Bayonne, NJ) In many bird species, the feathers around the brood patch fall out naturally during nesting season, though some species, such as many ducks, will intentionally pluck the feathers and use them to line the nest for better heat retention around the eggs. The exact size and location of the brood patch varies for each bird species, and the feathers will regrow shortly after the eggs have hatched. In altricial bird species such as songbirds, it may take slightly longer for the feathers to return since the helpless hatchlings will need their parents' help to regulate body temperature until they have grown Today, 10:13:21 − Flag − Like − Reply Liked by Cheryl Owen Rhonda Hargrove Dorothy ABil in SD Bette Marie Johnson very interesting. .. thank you Jan!                           Likewise where I am. I had to help evict a pair of burrowing owls who had decided that even though a very large building was being built on their nesting site, by golly, they were going to nest there! With help, we were able to relocate them to habitat set aside for that purpose. Though the owls didn't know that! Very territorial critters

                   I just heard crows going crazy near the tree in which I have an owl box with an Eastern Screech Owl. I went outside to check the situation and saw that there is a HAWK sit ting in the tree. It is not far from the owl house...hopefully, nothing has happened to the owl. The crows are insane with rage, but the hawk is just sitting there like he is the king of the world. It is really amazing because I live in the middle of a city. Yesterday, a possumate the cat food on the back porch. I always think I would like being in a more rural area. Maybe I don't have to after all.

                          Crows are funny like that with their noise.
                          Just as I signed off from here last night the "skunk light" (motion detector) on the garage came on so I went to look and there were two racoons--one rather small. Looks like we have a family in the neighborhood.
                          I haven't seen an opossumin several years but that doesn't mean they aren't out there.

                    Remember all the concern about the black spot on one of the owls in the doorway last night? I still think that was the incubation patch which female barn owls have where there are fewer feathers and more blood vessels in that area. The infrared camera picks up heat. Several owl web sites have this statement:
                     To help with incubation, female owls have a sparsely feathered brood patch on their belies that has a higher percentage of blood vessels than other parts of the skin. Blood flow through these vessels creates a good source of heat for the eggs.

                           The only issue with that theory is that I'm almost certain areas of higher "heat" would appear brighter, not darker, on a heat sensitive camera - which this is not. There is a big difference between real thermal imaging cameras and basic IR cameras like we have here. I believe the spot we were seeing was simply the birds foot, raised in front of its belly.
                           But I'm just an optimistic skeptic, so who knows.

                          Bill, then why is the presence of this incubation patch never cited in any of the literature on the gendering of barn owls. Certainly it would be a dead giveaway that the owl possessing it is a female.

                           I'm coming in late on this, so no one will probably read it. BUT, I have read that the brood patch only starts developing on the female when she is about to lay eggs. Which makes a lot of sense, since during normal nighttime activity, she could LOSE a lot of body heat with the area exposed to the wind.
                           Just sayin'

                    So...my 14 year old seems to have some resentment about me spending so much time with the owls..last night he was in the roomwhen they were all having there fly about moment. One here...one there...who's one first kindof thing. I was laughing at them and at all the comments being written. He read them with me and was laughing out loud right along with me!!! Think that problem is solved!!!

                    Postings and discussions below for ideas on another web cam to watch or where to go after the owls have gone. As for Sportsman's Paradise sites, thre is currently the Peregrine Falcons (I think another few weeks to go before they fledge), the Red Tailed Hawk site and the Eagle site (another couple of weeks to go for Nest 1 and more than that for blurry nest 2). The problem with a songbird site (hummingbirds, etc.) is that they are usually gone in such a very short time. I do like the Sportsman's chat room set-up and their efforts to keep the chat rooms a clean, fun place to be.

                          Good Morning!! I am checking really quick before some errands. I would love to meet on another web cam. Someone asked if SPO could hook up to the barn owl trust site. I don't know if anyone at SPO saw it or how we could have them check into that. Would be cool to follow barn owls again, since we have learned so much.

I read where you hope we can find a way to all check in with one another once this is over!!! That would be so nice!!!

Only stopped by for a minute. Another very hot day here in Maine - in the 90's again - unusual for here any time of year. No time to scroll too far down, but did catch the reposting of Roberta Jackson's "War and Peace" poem and noted that it was on the wiki page. Also, thanks for repost of the "recipe" submitted last riight by ??? about the owls. Despite the fact that it has nothing to do with a recipe that you bake, broil or fry, I hope it makes the front page of the cookbook as a "recipe for happiness and friendship" !! Glad to see everyone back in good humor and with a wealth of information today. Last night was another wonderful night to watch events unforlding and to chat. See you all later today.
