Lynn in Georgia My scte-in-law had a cat that she had declawed as a kitten and couldn't keep inside. She had all four paws declawed. She lived outside to be 22 years old. She managed to live at three different houses and environments and refused to be an inside cat. Never had a problem even climbing trees. Hard to explain, but she did fine.

Dr. Web M.D (Adam Curry) sorry cat people

Lynn in Georgia Adam, I felt the same way and have not had any of my cats declawed but have paid for it with furniture being destroyed. My sister-in-law never intended for her cat to be outside, but it had other ideas ... like I said, she did great.

Ruth - from MN Notes from Carlos "morning meeting" ... His grandson Austin will be taking care of all the videotaping at the picnic, doing so for internship in school. Everything will be done from laptop and remote. over 6000 MOD's have received invites - and thus far, about 160 plus have responded with a "yes" ... to be held, stand me if correct, at Walnut Park. Eric Blehm is probably attending!! This "THE" author of the Molly book. Other MOD pictures are being held across the country. Florida, Phoenix, Houston just held some (or going to, and one in Boston and North Carolina to be held same day as San Marcos's as I understand.

Melody, Dorothy, Karen, et al - re: your hummingbird photos. I can't be sure what species they are and Dorothy may be right (calliope). It is generally thought that only ruby-throated East of the Mississippi, but I have read reports of other species and I came across this site showing which species in each state <http://www.hummingbirds.net/states.html>. The yellow on the wings as shown in your pix confuses me. Ants always seem to be a problem I've tried several things. I've not tried Karen's deterrent - cinnamon in the cottage cheese container - , but I used to make similar "mats" using hairspray covers (or similar). Anyway - great photos!!!

I'm almost positive that the ones in your photos are not ruby-throated hummers. Did you see the yellow on the wings or was it just the lighting that made them appear that way. No matter what they are - just enjoy them - positive identity can come later !!! 😊

I have noticed the ruby throated hummer seems to change color depending on which way it turns in flight. Sometimes the throat seems almost black. I had several feeders as they are so territorial and will fight over the feeders. I enjoyed them so much and when I would put out fresh nectar, they would often swarm the feeder as I would hang it. The little critters were persistent and would fuss at me to get out of the way. 😊

Perhaps the lighting may have caused them to appear a little more yellow. The ones I saw in MO was about a week after a huge summer storm and the state conservationist said there would have to be two confirmed sightings for them to be recorded in the record books for the State of Missouri. The ones I saw were a cream-like and not really white nor yellow. I was told they were calliope and I remember thinking how much smaller they were than the ruby-throated hummer. The calliope also made a loud buzzing sound which surprised me.

This time of year anything east of central Nebraska/Kansas would be a Ruby-throated. Late summer other species may accidentally show up in the east and states like Louisiana and Mississippi have quite the collection of records. I haven't seen the photos you're talking about but light does strange things to hummer photos.

OK, I just found the photos down below. Looks like a female Ruby-throated with the light angle giving a yellowish cast to the green. The confusion over banded Calliope in the Northeast is that those were no doubt lost little hummers that someone caught and banded before it got too cold. Every year someone seems to overshoot their normal migration pattern and ends up way off course.

I went and looked at the pictures from last night. They really are getting out and on the different perches. Wish I could stay up and watch, but not a "night owl" heh. Are they all girls? Looks like everyone has spots on their belly.

I learned a bit from some good comments earlier. They all have the coloring of girls until about a year old when they molt again and the color of their gender comes in. Until then they are all camouflaged the same as the moms because the speckles make them harder to see in the woods. That apparently protects the young owls better.

Here an interesting site for those who home school or who have kids who like crafts. It has a number of paper crafts and one is for Barn Owls. It is in Japanese, but my computer translates it to English. Hope yours does too. 😊 Think I'll add that to the Wiki under Just for Kids if it isn't there already.

Try it in Google Chrome which has an automatic translate that Sherry apparently used. Otherwise, you really don't need to read it. Just go by the photos and the file names to download (such as barnowl.gif) are in English.

Which bootcamp? My son went to Great Lakes in March 2009. He is now stationed at Oceana NAS in Virginia Beach, VA. He is an aircraft mechanic. There is a great site for moms called Navy for Moms. My son said boot camp was easier than what he was told. PIR graduation was something you do not want to miss. He graduated (PIR) bootcamp May 15, 2009.

Good luck to you and your son... The weather should be great when your son graduates. Lots of sites to see in Chicago. One piece of advice for graduation... bring a chair pad, etc. as the bleachers are not comfortable. You'll get info in the arrivals hotels, when to get into the base... I suggest early to get a good seat. And most of all bring lots of tissues!!!! You will get one call when he arrives just to say "I made it" and that's it. You will also get a boy in the box in the mail. Everything he was wearing the day he arrives. Just take the bare essentials, clothes to wear there and his wallet. 😊

I just did a search and under wikipedia they show the callope hummingbirds and yours seem to look just like them. They do not usually get east of Colorado but a severe storm can occasionally push them eastward but that is unusual. I have seen callopes once before and they are so very tiny. Smaller than the usual hummer we get in MO.

Lynda - there seems to be a rash of this type of thing here. I started noticing it the other day. Even discounting questionable ones, there are several that seemed pretty obvious to me. Hopefully someone in charge is keeping track of all this, but it's really bugging me.

Ok, now for something totally not about owls. Just saw a video of the choir concert my daughter's friends were in this past week. She doesn't have time for choir anymore, but I'm sure she's sorry now. Just bear with me and watch the video for 30 seconds at least and you'll be laughing. It's the William Tell Overture.

I don't WANT to live like some third world country with bad teeth, rapid aging, monotonous food, disease and ignorance. We need to preserve the earth but I really do not want to live the lifestyle of the Native Americans. We need to carefully consider the trade-offs.

OK, with all the chat about wildlife two more pix before I get supper (after 6:00 here and hubby says he's hungry 😊 😊 This is a mother fox and a shot of one of her kits one year. She visited us daily for 5 years and brought her young (usually 4) to show us each year. She was NOT tame, but she "bonded" with us in some way. We did give her a treat once in a while, but never touched her or tried to make a "pet" of her. A story about her stress and confusion over losing one of the youngsters one year another time

A screaming sound usually only when she was very frightened (another story some day 😊 😊) but we would hear her and her mate "barking - screaming" at each other in late Winter/early Spring during mating season. Other than that it was usually just a soft "barking" at times when she was "talking" to her kits.

Susan, it appears that both genders of owls have the spots until they reach full adulthood at roughly age 1. That is what foils the attempts at guessing their gender at this age.

One of the big indicators is size, though, and females are larger than males. Austin is smaller than the other three, and Wes is definitely taller than all three when they are standing side by side. I'd bet on Austin being male and Wes female. Of course, that's with Adam's monopoly money. 😊

My husband reported that the fawn is gone and there are deer droppings all over the yard so we are assuming that the two had a happy reunion.

Today's wildlife story is that wood duckings traipsed behind our back yard. Neighbors came by looking for them and said in 30 years they had never seen any wood ducks (we are a mile from a lake and there are PLENTY of trees between here and there. All I had was my iPhone and the adult was sitting in the sunny patch so it looks white but you can see the outline. There was one ducking with it--they are all in people's backyards so can't check for them

Lynda, My younger children said there was a baby bird and I assume a robin and didn't go look as I was standing in the blackberries pulling out birdweed and honeysuckle vine. I heard them but I didn't take interest until the kids said there were people coming into our yard.

This seems to be the year of the wildlife for us! We haven't ever had adventures like this before - just sparrows nesting in birdhouses.

Funny Wood Duck story - My neighbor in SC was a likable guy but not very "woody." He had a beautiful Wood Duck mount in his LR. I asked if he bought it and he said, "No, it got it on my one and only hunting trip. Never fired the gun either. We were walking through the marsh, in the dark, on our way to the blind. Something unholy began thrashing and came tearing out of the dark reeds, right at my feet. Scared the bejesus out of me, so I swung my flashlight at it, trying to protect myself. Came home with a beautiful mount!" 😊

I don't think the price is bad at all for a limited edition print, and I hope it didn't sound that way. But many folks would never buy a limited edition print of anything because they wouldn't be willing to pay that price. Not everyone can afford that price, but more can afford $5-10 for the e-book. That's all I meant.

Understood and agreed, Chris. I was just surprised at the reasonably low price. I really was expecting a higher price, considering how many times Carlos emphasized that it was "Art for Collectors." He just gave me the impression that these were going to be "out there." Heck many, many people I know have trouble paying their basic bills, yet they will spend $99+ a month on cable and another $99 a month on phancy cell phone stuff. But I do understand that it's too much for many. I'm one of those many at the moment. 😊

At eight weeks old a typical fledgling Barn Owl has already learned to pounce but struggles to fly, at nine weeks it's flying fairly well, and by ten weeks it starts perfecting the art of landing, accurate pouncing, flying and hovering in various wind conditions. By eleven weeks many have made their first prey capture and some have already started to disperse. From 10 to 14 weeks the amount of food each one receives from the adults goes from an average of four small mammals per night down to zero. An owl that continues to spend time around its parent's (beyond c. 14 weeks old) may be chased away although lingering somewhere within the parental home range may be tolerated for longer as Barn Owls are not particularly territorial.

I posted this in the obsement but it is worth repeating. The quote is from the referenced web site.
"Like humans and other animals, birds play, dance, love and do things just for the pleasure of it. Birds, like humans, like company, move in flocks, preen each other, play together and share nest duties. Similarly, they grieve just like we do. The evidence is largely anecdotal, from ornithologists and bird watchers. I am willing to believe it because a creature that sings and laughs and fights and cheats on its mate can also feel sadness."

Thanks for that information, Mary. I do think birds do experience some kind of feeling of loss and I'm certain that animals (wild and domestic) do, as I have seen it. Perhaps scientists may disagree with the term "grief", but birds and animals experience a loss and confusion - might be called "loss of bonding".

I believe birds feel terrible stress and anxiety at the time, and that can really mess them up. But the way humans experience grief is impossible for critters that simply don't have the wiring for it. They don't have the luxury (if you can call it that) of time for grief: it would be a danger to their survival. This doesn't make them any less of a creature than we are, just different. I believe that we must understand this if we are to appreciate them for who they are. Each one of the species on this planet has a brain that has developed, through natural selection, to best aid it's own survival.

I agree, Jan, and perhaps "stress and anxiety" is a better term than grief and usually is only for a brief time.

Great quote - with exception of the "cheats on its mate" part. That concept doesn't apply as broadly in the animal world as it does to most humans. And for good reason.

I'll admit I have not seen the numbers on animal cheating. The wildlife shows have episodes of animals (even reptiles) cheating. It would make a nice research project to compare the incidence among species.

Thanks for shar ing, Karen. They are such beautiful, stately birds. I never minded a family or two of them at the large Maine lake we used to live on, but when a flock of 25 to 50 of them sometimes took up residence in our yard, they could leave the worst mess you ever saw. Eavh of the adults are said to produce 7 lbs of "po..." each day and it can get mighty slippery and messy 😊

A quick afternoon check-in. Still no time to check too far back in the chat. For those who commented on many cahts in the past about gardens and flowers an have vry limited yard space for fowers, I've had good luck with the "Bag-O-Booms" bags - plastic, hanging bags with slits cut in them to plant small seedlings. My choice has always been impatiens, because they tolerate shade well. It is best if the plants are very small in order to get them poked thru the slits. At times I have also used old teakettles, wash tubs, old-fashioned coffe pots, etc. to put flowers in. They can be displayed on a step, beside a walkway and even pices on an unsightly stump in some pretty unique ways.

My quick "take" on the "Gee That Was Fun" on the BLOG - perhaps not as well done as our Wiki and a little too much "copied" chat which is confusing, and perhaps the poetry isn't all as well done as the wonderful ones written here - but, I really think they ALL love. Donna and Moly and her family just as much as we do and they are expressing that love, appreciation and memories the same way we have here. In the scheme of things, that's what really counts.

My father had an unsightly stump in his front yard and couldn't afford to get it ground down. So I used a large wood-boring bit and a chisel and hollowed it out, then planted flowers in it. It ended up looking like the stump was put there deliberately to plant flowers in!

Exactly, Jan!! I'm too cheap and frugal to spend a lot of money on planting containers. Besides, I've had many one-of-a-kind and unusual plant containers that could never be found in a garden supply center. I've even used big, old bean pots and "pickle" crocks that were no longer usable for anything else.

My mother was a great one for doing that inside, Lynda. She loved ivy, and there was always plenty of it growing on the outside of the house, so mom would clip some and plant it in copper kettles, antique bottles on the windowsill, etc. And it always looked great; organic in the way that it looked like part of the house itself.

There's been some good research done recently that has discovered that (surprise!) many animals and birds have what we would call 'personalities,' that is, a group of traits possessed by an individual animal, not the species as a whole. So it's not surprising that we notice these personality traits in individual creatures. Of course, this is not news to anyone who owns a pet of any kind, but it does seem to have been news to the scientific community!!

I am going to take a wild guess right now about two of the owls. The one on the left I say is female, as it has darker feathers around the neck and darker chest feathers and more spots. Whereas, the middle one, I think is a male, as it's neck and chest are whiter and less spots... can't see the one with it's head up against the wall..

It's impossible to be sure at this stage, Lori. Their adult feathers only come in at their second molt, and that will be way after they fly away from the owl box for good. There's been a ton of speculation in this chat room about it, but no one can know for sure - even owl experts.

Yes, Roberta - the latest I heard was that there was a crow attack on Phoebe's nest. One of the babies was found and put back in the nest by the host: I believe he's still looking for the other one.

I'm thankful I wasn't watching at the time. I realize "survival of the fittest" is the norm, but I can only imagine how horrifying it was for those watching. I understand H&H were Phoebe's fourth dutch this year. Perhaps she will have another.

Well, she's still got at least one from this clutch. And maybe the other one can be found. If the crows didn't get it, then it's hiding in the shrubs somewhere, and you can be sure that mama will find it!!

When I peeked in last night, the babies looked well-feathered and they definitely filled up that tiny nest. I'm glad at least one was located. I'm sure that animal parents "mourn" much like we do. There I go, giving them human characteristics.....

Well, they don't 'mourn' in the way we do, Roberta. Their brains aren't structured that way. But they do get very stressed-out and anxious when it happens. And it's hard for us to watch them go through it. The good thing is that, because they're incapable of mourning, they get over it very quickly and go on to doing their biggest job: continuing the survival of their species.

I, for one, agree with this web site that said:
"Like humans and other animals, birds play, dance, love and do things just for the pleasure of it. Birds, like humans, like company, move in flocks, preen each other, play together and share nest duties.
Similarly, they grieve just like we do. The evidence is largely anecdotal, from ornithologists and bird watchers. I am willing to believe it because a creature that sings and laughs and fights and cheats on its mate can also feel sadness."

Unfortunately, babies in a nest are prime targets for crows, bluejays, hawks, etc. The sooner the babies get out of the nest, the better their chances of survival. Once they can branch, they can hide in shrubs until they've got their flying skills down pat. Pale Male, my favorite Red-tail, once went to a Robin's nest and popped down 5 babies, one by one like they were twinkies. That's the way it goes. . .

I've been there, and I've looked at them in the nest through the huge lens that Lincoln Karlmoften has set up there. Sadly, their eggs did not hatch again this year. To see a picture of the two of them, standing in the nest and staring down at the eggs that wouldn't hatch, is heart-breaking. Ever since the nest was removed and then put back in in 2005, none of their eggs have hatched. But I was lucky enough to see their last brood, and see them Fed-3, in that they spend the entire year together, not just during nesting time. It's lovely to see them together!

When the building takes out those spooky things, maybe they can turn the eggs over properly and have more babies. In the meantime, as Marie Winn says, they're just hangin' and enjoying each other till next year. And 25--is that right?--progeny is not too shabby a record!

I sure isn't! But it looks like the spikes weren't the problem after all. The nest has increased greatly over the past 4 years; they've been quite able to turn the eggs, but the results have been the same - nada. But they do enjoy each other very much; the red-tail expert who contributes to Marie's blog once in a while said that they were unusually close for a red-tail pair. It's really touching to see pictures of them every day, and see how close they are. They, like Molly, McGee & their kids, have been elegant and delightful ambassadors for birds everywhere.

We can all guess about gender but the experts have told us that right now it's just guessing. They will molt later this summer and the new feathers may be lighter and less spotted than these. They say you really can't tell until one of them lays eggs! LOL So, no, we don't know for certain and Carlos just says "It's too early to tell."

Way down in the nest,
the little birds rest,
all through the night.
With a wing on the left,
and a wing on the right,
the little birds sleep all through the night.
The bright sun comes up,
the dew falls away,
Good Morning, Good Morning, the little birds say!! 😊

BUNNY ... can you share with me - era?! you learned this? I was a grade school girl scout and later a leader about 12 years ago. I never ran across it ... maybe it's a regional thing. ... Just wondering as mom never knew where she learned it - ... and SHE was an older! 😊

One of my scouts reminded me of it but I think I learned it as a girl in Southern California (1960's). I was a Camp Fire Girl, not a Girl Scout (we sang all the same songs and did the same stuff) but Camp Fire in my current neighborhood is co-ed. So my daughter and I joined Scouts. The first lines are sung very quietly with little "sleeping" and "wing tucking" hand motions. then the BRIGHT SUN COMES OUT!!!!!! THE DEW FALLS AWAY (sung very low) GOOD MORNING GOOD MORNING!!!! (hand waving) the little birds say. Obnoxious.

My cat (now at Rainbow Bridge) used to get these clumps of hair that were loose and we so satisfying to pull out! That's what these remind me of (it didn't hurt him, they weren't attached anymore 😊).

 Ruth, I'm sorry I didn't realize you were having problems. Guess I've been off the site more than I've been on for a few days! We've often suggested that people upgrade their flash player if the chat hangs up or they lose the camera view. The upgrade should give you an instant improvement!

 Any Northern Ohioans still in the room?
 Want to meet up at this event at North Chagrin Nature Center? They have 3 owls in the Education building, which I assume will also be in use for this event.

 The education building, where the owls live, is not always open. It's separate from the Nature Center (next door) so you can't just drop in anytime and expect to see the owls.

 Nature at it's best/worst depending on which side of the talons you are on. I have flown with some pilots who could take lessons from the owl on landing techniques! 😊

 Wow! That was AWESOME! That owl resembles our owls very closely and now I have a much more appreciation for how they hunt and are able to get their food. I always wondered why their feathers around their eyes were made like that. Amazing!

 I check on Owl/ia's owlets once in a while. They said the oldest has been sleeping in the trees during the day. It won't be long before our owlets do the same since they are about the same age. (SNIFF) 😊
